

ANNIE FINCH

Now in November

Now in November, as I face towards home pulling my living behind me, and my dead, the skulls of fire widen into a road.

November turns into a room of leaves and lets them fall around him. Then he goes, and where he stood, his body blank and bare, only a halo of shocked twigs remains spread on the still green, still elusive grass.